seen a sugar factory, and although he was a talented architect and builder he was not an engineer. He had no background in machinery design or chemical process operations. He was given a field piled with fifty-odd wagonloads of machinery, John Taylor's notes, and Brigham's blessing. Angell was aware of the challenge and of his limitations. His journal for this period recounts the effort and his concern for the quality of the work.¹⁷

The actual construction of the factory building was probably under the direction of A. O. Smoot, the first bishop of the Sugar House Ward. A record listing those laboring on the Sugar Works building was kept by Joseph Vernon who was apparently working as clerk to Bishop Smoot.¹⁸ It is logical to assume that a church public works project such as this would have been under the immediate direction of the bishop of the local ward.

Following the church takeover some of the original DMC personnel left the venture. The exact number is not clear, but it is certain that John Taylor and Philip DeLaMare both left at this time and very little is subsequently said about Henry Mollenhauer. Their absence would have been critical as they were the only people in Utah who had actually visited a sugar beet processing factory. John Bollwinkle was the only original sugar worker of record when the Sugar House factory was operating. His experience, so far as can be determined, was in Liverpool sugar factories. Prior to 1868 the English sugar industry was exclusively engaged in cane sugar refining, so it is doubtful that he had any experience with sugar beet processing.¹⁹

John Taylor's notes are reasonably complete and accurate.²⁰ A few details are sketchy and a number of terms are not fully explained, but the essential information required to successfully process sugar beets is present. To one who had not seen the equipment in operation the information could have been somewhat confusing, however.

The English engineer Joseph Vernon was also working on the project. His skills appear to have been more with fabrication than operation. His recorded efforts are in the area of the actual factory building construction. Not too much is known about Vernon himself other than that he was reputed to have worked for Faucett Preston, joining the DMC and the church in Liverpool. The language of a talk he gave a few year's later indicates that he was fairly well educated. He traveled with John Taylor to Utah and was involved with the sugar project to the last, operating the factory with Henry Wilde its final season. Vernon later moved to Hawaii where he subsequently died.²¹

THE SUGAR HOUSE FACTORY

Delays plagued the project. Other church construction projects such as the Salt Lake Temple competed for men and materials.

¹⁹Mollenhauer is somewhat of a mystery figure. Very little is recorded about him. The only place his first name has been found is on receipts for funds drawn from the DMC in 1851 (DMC Papers). He was apparently a figure of authority as all of the contemporary records refer to him as Mr. (or Bro.) Mollenhauer. As noted above, he apparently did not travel to Utah with any of the other DMC groups. He did leave his family behind in Liverpool (DMC meeting, March 17, 1853). Mollenhauer seems to have left Utah before 1855 as no mention is made of him during the Sugar House operating period. For Bollwinkle see Sugar Factory Journal, DMC Papers; Michael Foy, The Sugar Industry in Ireland (Dublin: Irish Sugar Company, 1976), p. 30.
